

Dear FCC,

I'm a technologist and have contributed to many of the web technologies used by a majority of internet users today, from web browsers to web server software to lower level components like software libraries. I am writing you to implore you not to end net neutrality as this would be a devastating mistake that would take away freedoms internet users currently benefit from and give control to service providers allowing them to restrict access to content or charge more by charging internet users more for the services they already pay for and, frankly, pay too much for already.

It is clear the FCC is not draining the swamp but rather has made the swamp even more murky by ignoring millions of Americans voices and moving forward with the idea of net neutrality ending, which has been defeated in the past.

Americans want Net Neutrality.
